Professional Former Technical Advisor at a Japanese Patent Law Firm Starts Own Patent Translation Service

September 18, 2012/New York, NY – Today’s marketplace is global and so is the need to protect one’s innovation, technology and brand.

“As we saw in the Apple Samsung case, patent protection does not stop at the water’s edge,” says Makoto Izawa, founder of Japan Patent Services.

“Japan is still the number two patent market after the U.S., and we wanted to offer a comprehensive, one-stop translation and language service for all matters related to IP.”

The company handles patent translations for Japan Patent Office filing, patent searches, and provides litigation support via interpretation and document reviewer services.

Izawa says his team of interpreters is composed by not only linguists, but experts in patents and specific areas of technology.

“When you translate patents, you need a thorough knowledge of the technology to understand the innovation and we have selected a team of linguists who also have advanced degrees in a particular field and will ensure that your language documents are done right.”

About Japan Patent Services: Japan Patent Services was founded by Makoto Izawa, a veteran patent translator of 20 years and a former technical advisor in mechanical engineering at a Japanese patent firm. The company provides patent translations, patent searches and litigation language support for infringement lawsuits in the U.S.
